The title and abstract of my PhD dissertation (298 words)

The effectiveness of a counselling program for treating stress and depression among a patients suffering from diabetes.

The present study aimed to develop a counselling program for treating stress and depression among a patients suffering from diabetes. It also aimed to explore the effectiveness of the latter program.

The sample of the present study consists from thirty (30) individuals who were chosen through the following method:

The stress scale and Rudolf scale for depression were administered in the Jordan University Hospital (JUH). The ones who obtained high degrees on the stress and depression scales were chosen. They were divided into two groups (i.e. the control and experimental groups).

The researcher administered the stress scale and Rudolf scale for depression before and after implementing the program.

The counseling program consists from twenty (20) counselling sessions. It was developed based on the cognitive behavioral theory. The counselling program was implemented on the experimental group. That was done through holding two sessions each week. The duration of each session is sixty (60) minutes. After administering the pre-scale to the two groups and implementing the program, the post-scale was administered to the two groups.

It was found that there are significant differences between the control and experimental groups in terms of the stress level and depression symptoms. In fact, the stress level and severity of the depression symptoms dropped among the members of the experimental group. It was found that the proposed counselling program –that’s based on the cognitive behavioral theory – is deemed effective in reducing the stress level and severity of the depression symptoms among the members of the experimental group. The researcher of the present study recommends conducting more studies addressing the counselling programs that target the patients suffering from diabetes. That should be done with targeting all age categories.
